Category:Xilinx softwareThe goals of this project are to characterize the physiological regulation of tyrosine aminotransferase in the liver and kidney and to determine the relation of enzyme levels to human disease states.

The development of specific radioimmunoassays for tyrosine aminotransferase has made possible studies of its regulation in man. In the rat tyrosine aminotransferase is highly inducible following administration of beta-naphthoflavone. Studies are under way to determine the mechanism of this induction and the relation of enzyme induction to other responses to this naphthoflavone. Studies of tyrosine aminotransferase levels in human and dog livers and kidneys are also being made. It is known that both hepatic and renal levels of tyrosine aminotransferase are elevated in various forms of liver disease and in renal failure. Studies are in progress to determine if tyrosine aminotransferase levels are increased in response to these disease states and if so whether this increase is related to other functional changes in the liver and kidney. Further studies on the induction of the enzyme in the rat by beta-naphthoflavone are also under way.Elastic waves in two-dimensional layered media. An analytic solution is presented for elastic waves propagating in layered media, subject to a distribution of planar inclusions. The solution is characterized by a scalar potential field, which, under appropriate boundary conditions
